

Reduced Recoil Anti-Armor Gun

Abstract

The present invention is an improvement to the existing Barrett anti-armor gun. The weapon is modified to fire from the open bolt, wherein the forward momentum of the recoiling masses at the moment of firing offset a significant portion of the recoil impulse from firing. The modifications provide a means for reducing the recoil energy absorbed by the shooter.